

Does Sudan have a nhbps?

While no NHBPS has been undertaken recently, the World Bank estimates show that the poverty rate has risen over the last few years from 48.3 percent in 2019 to 55.4 percent in 2020 and 66.1 percent in 2022, largely on account of inflation, the COVID-19 crisis, and political instability. Yet, Sudan's economic prospects have not always been dire.

Does inflation inertia explain current inflation in Sudan?

The importance that past inflation shocks play in explaining current inflation in both models confirms the role of inflation inertia in Sudan. A clear priority on price stability should be the primary objective for the Central Bank of Sudan.

How do we estimate the economic model of Sudan?

We estimated the model using Sudan's monthly data from January 2007 to March 2022, with a total of 183 observations per series used. We used CPI data from IMF international financial statistics, public expenditure, and money supply data from the CBoS, and exchange rate data from the AfDB.

Are high inflationary pressures a macroeconomic challenge for Sudan?

Sudan's history of high inflation suggests that strong inflationary pressures remain an important macroeconomic challenge for the country. This Report identifies and quantifies the inflationary pressures over the period 1992-2022, and proposes policy measures to reduce inflation in Sudan.

Is monetization a major driver of inflation in Sudan?

A key finding of the analysis is that monetization of the fiscal deficit is a major driver of inflation in Sudan. It is therefore important that policies aimed at addressing inflation in Sudan prioritize measures to gradually reduce budget deficit.

How has the war impacted data collection in Sudan?

The team is typically headed by the government of the country being assessed. But in Sudan, the war has upended data collection. Violence, military checkpoints and movement restrictions make it unsafe or impossible to gather information in many areas, and the data that's harvested sometimes fails to meet the IPC's standards.
